This paper, starting from the reference scientific bibliography and from documental research through the most important databases on the immigration and globalization, aims to provide an answer on the phenomenon of migration in a globalized world, analyzing migration flows, demographic, social changes and economic, and the multicultural aspect. In most discussions of immigration, immigrant numbers are one of the main topics. The paper highlights how there is a substantial difference between the migrations at the national level and migrations at the international level, highlighting the changes compared to the last century. Most people migrate internationally for work needs, or for tragic events such as conflicts, persecutions, etc. The research highlights how the so-called developed countries increasingly require immigrants with a high level of skills. The problem of acceptance and mistrust will also be addressed. The multicultural aspect plays an important factor in the integration of immigrants in the new host countries. The processes of globalization activate today dynamics of transformation that concern all aspects of society, overcoming territorial constraints. Globalization is characterized by cultural homogeneity, by multiculturalism, by the free circulation of goods, and by a strong power exercised by multinationals over local governments.
